ACTIVE RESEARCH PROJECTS

Bias in Performance Evaluations. With Judith Rosenstein and Margaret Nikolov, U. S. Naval Academy. This project on gender bias analyzes a multi-year dataset of peer and supervisory performance evaluations using objective rankings and subjective attributes. As women increase participation in traditionally male occupations, gender stereotypes and bias continue to create challenges in advancement to higher levels of leadership. Biased performance evaluations provide negative feedback to women that may hinder career aspirations and retention as well as limit their ability to promote in the organization. Role congruity theory (Eagly & Karau, 2002) posits that women will be evaluated less positively than men in masculine roles such as managerial and organizational leadership. Using a peer performance evaluation system database at the U.S. Naval Academy, we analyze a semester cross-section of subjective peer evaluation attributes assigned to all students across all four class years for gender bias. While subjective performance evaluations may allow for more gender bias, as men and women continue working together they may begin to change stereotypical perceptions based on counter-stereotypical performance and for the military women in this research, trust and confidence in their talent and competence as leaders.
